Do you feel more energetic when listening to your favorite songs? Do you study better with background music? There's real science behind why music has such a powerful influence on teenage brains.

During the teenage years, your brain is going through big changes. It's growing and forming new connections every day. Music can actually help this process (过程). When you listen to music, many different areas of your brain work together—the parts that control hearing, memory, emotions (情绪), and even movement. This "workout" makes your brain stronger and more connected.

Music also helps teenagers deal with stress and strong emotions. The teenage years can be challenging, with school pressure, friendship problems, and family problems. Studies show that listening to music releases dopamine, a chemical that makes you feel good. It can calm you down when you're angry or lift your spirits when you're sad. Many teenagers use music as a healthy way to express and manage their feelings.

Learning to play a musical instrument brings even more benefits. It improves your memory, attention, and problem-solving skills. Musicians often do better in subjects like math and languages because music training strengthens the brain's ability to recognize patterns and deal with information quickly.

However, it's important to listen to music wisely. Playing music too loudly through headphones can damage your hearing. Experts suggest keeping the volume (音量) at 60% or lower and taking breaks every hour.

Music can also influence your sleep. While calm music helps you relax before bed, loud or exciting music might make it harder to fall asleep. Choose your music carefully, depending on what you need.

The teenage brain is special—it's flexible (灵活的) and ready to learn. Music is a powerful tool that can help you grow smarter, happier, and healthier. So next time you press play, remember: you're not just enjoying a song; you're training your brain！

Answer the questions (根据短文内容，回答下列问题)

As we know music can not only bring us wonderful enjoyment, but also happiness when we are tired or sad. And many people have the habit of enjoying music when they are free. But to our surprise, one English school allows children to listen to music or even to have the TV on while they are studying, and they find it is helpful to improve the students' grades.

According to a research at Millfield School, about 20% of teenagers work best with background music, 10% excellent when allowed to finish their work with short walks around the room while up to 80% can concentrate better if allowed to play with a small object.

The research has made the school use a very new way, encouraging students to discover which learning styles suit them best, and then let them do their homework listening to music or even lying down. Some parents don't believe, but many are now accepting it at home where children are allowed to do their work with the television on.

"I prefer to work on the floor with music on low," said Sam, a 13-year-old girl. "At first my parents thought I didn't study hard, but my teacher asked them to look at my homework and when they saw it was okay, they agreed at last."

35．What can the music bring us?
